Shrinking Cities

The situation is dramatic: 1.3 million apartments in eastern Germany are untenanted. In the year 2030, the figure is expected to increase to 2 million. The unemployment rate is 20 percent. More than a million residents have left the new states of the former East Germany. Young, well-educated people in particular are turning their backs on their home regions for the West in pursuit of jobs or apprenticeships, which are currently rare even there. The prognosis is that the population of eastern Germany will be halved by 2050 – also because of demographic trends.

Eastern Germany is not a unique case. Along with several shrinking regions in western Germany, all over the world there are about 400 cities with populations over 100,000 that have lastingly shrunk in the last fifty years. The population in the old industrial states is beginning to decline; the process of urbanization has reached or past its zenith; the economy is still growing slightly, but employment has steadily fallen for quite some time. It is the end of a 200-year epoch in which the industrial countries' population, economy, affluence, and cities grew almost continuously and usually rapidly.

The Exhibition Shrinking Cities of the initiative project of Germany's Federal Cultural Foundation, the Kulturstiftung des Bundes, explores for the first time from an international perspective an urban development that has long since become a global phenomenon. Since Fall 2002, local teams have been commissioned in the four shrinking cities Detroit (USA), Manchester/Liverpool (Britain), Ivanovo (Russia), and Halle/Leipzig (Germany) to investigate and document processes of urban shrinking. In more than sixty exhibition contributions, artists, architects, filmmakers, journalists, culture experts, and social scientists reveal the changed reality of these cities. The topics the teams address range from the neglect and appropriation of spaces through changed practices of everyday life and new forms of work to the development of innovative subcultures and criticism of established planning cultures.
